Course Structure / Schedule: (3+0+0) 3 / 6 ECTS Extended Description: This course provides an overview of the ways in which gender based inequalities and political constructions of gender influence politics both at national and international levels. The focus is on both political constructions of gender, and political mobilization based on gender. The course starts with conceptual and theoretical debates around feminism, and proceeds with the ways in which gender perspective contributes to political science and international relations. Second, the gendered discourses surrounding global politics and national identity formation are explored. Third, women's participation in politics is discussed, highlighting the interaction of processes such as democratization and development with gender in/equality. Fourth, the parameters of developmental and economic issues are discussed, with special emphasis on the problems surrounding women's relation to the labor market. The course concludes with the most salient current policy debates related to women in Turkey, such as women's labor force participation, violence against women, and politics of reproduction and the family are discussed.
